

Comments on Journal of Contemporary Religion

Read what others have been saying about the Journal of Contemporary Religion on the occasion of its 25th anniversary:

“The Journal of Contemporary Religion has become one of the most important and interesting journals in the academic study of religion. The excellence, currency, and multidisciplinary character of its articles has earned the journal recognition as one of preferred venues for publication, especially among the rising generation of new scholars seeking to extend the horizon of the field.”

Lorne Dawson, University of Waterloo, Canada

“The Journal of Contemporary Religion has contributed significantly to putting the contemporary, the global, and the significant in the scholarly study of religion in the forefront. There are other journals that are simply about religion, and there are journals that are about specific sorts of religion or specific approaches to religion and the study of religion, but the JCR cuts across all these other categories to focus very much on the contemporary and therefore has made an enormous contribution to the idea that religion is alive, changing, never has been on the point of disappearing, and relevant. It is, in sum, a unique journal that makes a contribution no other journal concerned with religion makes.”

Peter Beyer, University of Ottawa, Canada

“I’m constantly amazed at the range of material that that JCR covers. It has articles on new religious developments, new looks at established issues, religious analysis of quasi-religious settings, and undernoticed but significant religious esoterica – all from many traditions. Its reviews range even farther, covering an encyclopedic array of books. Both articles and reviews lead me down roads that I might never find on my own. JCR’s authors come from many fields and write to many issues, but the result is anything but cacophony. Instead, the editors give us an astoundingly broad intellectual conversation. I know of no other journal with such richness and such depth.”

James V. Spickard, University of Redlands, California, USA

“British social scientists of religion owe a great debt to Peter Clark for founding, and Elisabeth Arweck for managing, the Journal of Contemporary Religion. In providing a first-class outlet for descriptive and explanatory accounts of current religious phenomena, it served an obvious need. I am proud to have published in it and readily recommend it to all my colleagues.”

Steve Bruce, University of Aberdeen, UK

Why not have a look for yourself and find out why the journal is held in such high regard? View a free online sample copy by visiting the journal homepage at:

www.tandf.co.uk/journals/cjcr and clicking on the ‘Free Sample Copy’ link.

