Volume 27, Issue 3, 2009

Seamus O'Hanlon, Monash University, Australia
Chris Hamnett, King's College London, UK

This special issue examines some of the major changes that have taken place over the last 40 years in the economy, social structure, housing markets and physical character of the inner areas of London and Melbourne. The articles arise from a joint Monash University–King's College London symposium. Although the two cities are very different in terms of their size and global economic position they have historically shared many economic, social and cultural ties. In recent years, the two cities have been subject to similar processes of change in terms of deindustrialisation and the growth of a large financial and business services sector. These changes have had relatively similar impacts in terms of the transformation of the cities' occupational class structure which has led to major changes in land use.
